- 2017 Healthy Food Behavior Research Grants: Using Behavioral Economics to Promote Healthier, Economical Food Choice by Low-Income Consumers
- The BECR Center seeks proposals for Healthy Food Behavior Research Grants that draw on behavioral economics theory to develop and test strategies for improving food choice behavior in low-income populations, particularly SNAP participants, using field experiments that leverage existing research activities.
- Policy relevant research projects related to SNAP participants that employ behavioral economic strategies in the food retail environment are encouraged. In particular, we are interested in approaches that could feasibly be scalable, possibly via such strategies as integration into the USDA SNAP-Ed program. We are also interested in research to test the feasibility and effectiveness of larger-scale implementation of a strategy previously shown to be efficacious in a smaller-scale experiment.
- BECR will award up to 2 grants (of up to $50,000 each) to teams of researchers to develop and implement focused field experiments using behavioral economics theory and strategies to promote healthy, economical food purchasing by SNAP participants and other low-income consumers. Funding will span a 12-month period so proposals that can build upon ongoing research activities are encouraged.
